Searching for a Universal Ethic by William C. Mattison III

Of course that is a very controversial idea. If there is such a universal moral code, then we have an imperative to try to discover it, and to make it universally accepted (to make it a moral code in the descriptive sense). But this requires thinking hard about ethics, not looking for some code that might or might not be written into our brains.

A Universal Moral Code? | Practical Ethics

Consumers want more ethical media but how can the industry provide it? Recent moves by agencies and media owners to spur diversity and sustainability are encouraging. Now we need a broader conversation about creating universal standards.
