Research on guided imagery in women with breast cancer In studies of breast cancer patients, guided imagery has been shown to help the immune system and relieve anxiety, depression, and moodiness. In a small study conducted at Oregon Health and Science University published in 2002, 25 women with stage I and II breast cancer were led through individual hypnotic-guided imagery sessions.

Guided Imagery - Breast Cancer Information and Support

Traditionally, guided imagery for cancer focused on stimulating the immune system with “warfare” imagery. A patient would visualize fighting their cancer with artillery blasts, laser guns, and other violent means to stimulate the immune system. But rather than add negativity to an already difficult situation, this program takes another approach.

Guided imagery (also known as guided affective imagery, or katathym-imaginative psychotherapy (KIP)) is a mind-body intervention by which a trained practitioner or teacher helps a participant or patient to evoke and generate mental images that simulate or re-create the sensory perception of sights, sounds, tastes, smells, movements, and images associated with touch, such as texture, temperature, and pressure, as well as imaginative or mental content that the participant or patient ...

Guided imagery - Wikipedia

If using colour in imagery, do not use red to denote the cancer cells as this suggests strength and energy. Most people choose to see the cancer as black or grey. Green or turquoise are good colours for healing, blue for relaxation, but you can use any colour (other than red) that you associate with healing.

Imagery for Self Help - physical conditions including cancer

Guided imagery as a complementary therapy There is no evidence at this time that guided imagery can treat cancer itself. Very few studies have looked at the effectiveness of guided therapy in people living with cancer. More research is needed because the studies that have been done so far have not shown consistent results.

Guided imagery - Canadian Cancer Society

Conclusion: Guided imagery, as a sole adjuvant cancer therapy may be psycho-supportive and increase comfort. There is no compelling evidence to suggest positive effects on physical symptoms such as nausea and vomiting. The data seem sufficiently encouraging for the use of guided imagery as an adjuvant cancer therapy to merit further research.
