Ecofeminism and Intersectional Environmentalism both advocate for social and environmental justice, with a few nuances that differentiate the two: one is a type of environmentalism that explores the relationship between women and nature while the other also advocates for feminism, but is broader in its representation.

The Difference Between Ecofeminism & Intersectional ...

Also called ecological feminism, ecofeminism can be defined as a multiple set of interconnected theories and practices that embraces animal, environmental, and feminist studies and remains united by the very fundamental categories of its approaches: women, animals, and environment. The relationship between these categories is basically established through a chain of domination, exploitation, and oppression that affects both.
