In Queen Anne: Patroness of Arts, Professor James Anderson Winn, author of The Poetry of War and John Dryden and His World, argues that history has underestimated Queen Anne. She may not have received a classical education in the manner of Elizabeth I or Mary, Queen of Scots but she played the harpsichord and guitar, danced and performed in court theatricals, promoted the opera, spoke fluent French, quoted poetry from memory, appreciated architecture and painting and mastered political oratory.

Another unfortunate aspect of this book's determination to reinvent Queen Anne as a passionate lover of the arts is its inaccurate portrayal of her immediate predecessors on the throne, her sister and brother-in-law William and Mary, who are presented here as indifferent to the arts in order to serve as the dark backdrop against which the "patroness of arts" Anne can shine more brightly by contrast.
