The single most important figure to treat this subject in the late Middle Ages was Dante Alighieri. The Dantean argument on language with its implicit acknowledgment of a classical bilingualism and its faith in the efficacy of the vernacular stimulated and defined the debate on language among the humanists of the 15th century.

Mazzocco's other objective is to establish the extent to which Dante's remarks on language in the Convivio and the De vulgari eloquentia shaped humanists' linguistic theories. While Mazzocco provides a clear account of the interconnections among humanist considerations of the topic, his contention that Dante directly shaped the thinking of figures like Bruni is less convincing.

And it is Dante Alighieri's description of these 4 levels of interpretation—from his book Il Convivio (The Banquet)—that modern critics look to for insight into mediæval literary criticism. In Il Convivio Dante says, "it is necessary to know that writings can be understood and ought to be expounded principally in four senses" 1. This need not only apply to the Bible or mediæval writings though.
