Unformatted text preview: Chapter 8 Beta Decay 8.1 Introduction We have seen that many thousands of nuclei can be produced and studied in the lab. However, only less than 300 of these nuclei are stable, the rest are radioactive. We have also seen that the degree of instability grows with the "distance" a given nuclide is from the stable nuclide with the same mass number.

In beta decay, there is an apparent violation of the law of conservation of angular momentum. The total spin angular momentum of the initial particle before the decay occurs must equal the total angular momentum of all particles produced afterwards. This is not satisfied by the nuclear reaction shown above.
