When is Migration a Security Issue?

Some scholars have suggested that migration has, indeed, been addressed as a security issue in both the pre-and post-9/11 period (Huysmans 2006; Van Munster 2009). Others, by contrast, question whether it is appropriate to claim that migration has been securitised in a context marked by intensified concerns over terrorism (Boswell 2007a).

The Securitisation of Migration: An Absent Presence ...

The securitization approach developed by the Copenhagen School situates the construction of security in political discourse, whereby ‘security is not of interest as a sign that refers to something more real; the utterance itself is the act’ (Wæver, 1995: 55 – original emphasis). The language of security depicts certain issues, such as migration, as an existential threat to a referent object, usually the state, in order to legitimize exceptional measures and to mobilize resources ...

The securitization of migration also implies a categorization of migration. Categories have always been an essential tool of political power. The use of such categories in official discourses does have an impact not only on public perceptions of migratory phenomena, but also on real lives of migrants through enforcement of state policies.

Implications of the Securitisation of Migration

the nature and mechanisms of the securitization of migration is the subject of considerable debate.1In international relations (IR), scholars attuned to realist premises of anarchy and material interest argue that Western states should fear the “coming anarchy” associated with mass migration (Huntington 2004; Kaplan 1994).

The Securitization of Migration - Philippe Bourbeau

Abstract. The systematic inclusion of refugees, asylum seekers, and other categories of migrants on the research agendas of security scholars is a relatively recent phenomenon. Forced migrants were mostly ignored by Security Studies during the Cold War. The growth in interest in the security dimension of forced migration has gone hand in hand with the widening of the security agenda taking place around the end of the Cold War.
