Whilst footfall-induced vibrations on buildings or bridges are normally ignored in terms of structural integrity, footfall vibration can be a critical serviceability condition. This publication guides the structural engineer through the process for designing for vibration, and includes flowcharts for calculation procedures and a useful glossary. The publication covers a new method for evaluating the response of a single pedestrian walking on a flat surface, such as a floor slab or bridge deck.

A Design Guide for Footfall Induced Vibration of Structures, by M R Willford and P Young, published for The Concrete Centre by The Concrete Society, presents a new method for evaluating the vibration due to a single pedestrian walking on a flat surface, such as a floor slab or bridge deck. The method was developed by Arup, and has been calibrated and refined with verification measurements taken on completed structures over a period of ten years.

Footfall-induced vibration

A methodology, based on modal analysis, for predicting the vertical vibration induced by pedestrians crossing structures like floors and bridges, enabling first principles calculations without the need for arbitrary or empirical factors. Explains footfall-induced vibration as well as how to quantify and predict vibration, with worked examples.

CADS Footfall Analysis (CFA) is post-processing software that is used in conjunction with Dlubal RFEM and SCIA Engineer to provide footfall response analysis calculation. Footfall response is of interest to users concerned about the vibration induced in their structures due to walking related activities. As advances in structural design result in more efficient and lighter irregular structures, sensitivity to vibration of the structures is becoming increasingly significant.

Description of Footfall Harmonic Analysis | Robot ...

The design of composite floors is very often driven by the need of meeting desired vibration characteristics, and it requires complex analyses of footfall-induced vibrations. Designing a floor system that minimizes the use of materials and meets vibration serviceability requirements is a non-trivial exercise and the design
