I assume you mean exposure compensation in Manual with Auto ISO. With my 7D, I just don't worry about it, using evaluative metering which links to the active AF point, I find exposure is close enough that there is enough exposure latitude even with the classic 7D. I just shoot RAW and lift the exposure as needed during post processing.

YES - manual mode, auto ISO & exposure compensation EOS-1D X introduced the notion of being able to use exposure compensation with manual mode and auto ISO. It's something that seems strange to a lot of “older” photographers - manual meant manual - but if you think of manual with auto ISO as shutter and aperture priority then it makes sense to be able to access exposure compensation.

Manual mode, auto ISO and exposure compensation

The other is to use exposure compensation (and Aperture or Shutter Priority mode). The best solution depends on the situation in which you find yourself, plus the configuration of your camera's dials. For example, with a Canon

EOS digital SLR it's easy to apply exposure compensation by moving the Quick control dial on the back of the camera. It's so simple you don't need to take your eye away from the viewfinder.

Manual Mode or Exposure Compensation - Which is Best?

In order to use exposure compensation, you must be in one of the camera modes that utilizes the camera meter, such as aperture priority, shutter priority, program mode, or any other "scene" mode that performs automatic exposure adjustments.
