Affective neuroscience of pleasure: reward in humans and animals. Berridge KC., Kringelbach ML. INTRODUCTION:

Pleasure and reward are generated by brain circuits that are largely shared between humans and other animals. DISCUSSION: Here, we survey some fundamental topics regarding pleasure mechanisms and explicitly compare humans and animals. CONCLUSION: Topics surveyed include liking, wanting, and learning components of reward; brain coding versus brain causing of reward; subjective ...

Affect, the hedonic quality of pleasure or displeasure, is what distinguishes emotion from other psychological processes. Affect therefore distinguishes affective neuroscience from other branches of neuroscience, and in a sense, all affective neuroscience could be viewed as a search for affect in the brain. Yet to search for affect itself, as a core process of pleasure or displeasure, has rarely been the explicit goal of affective neuroscience studies.

Neuroscience of affect: brain mechanisms of pleasure and ...

Introducing Affective Neuroscience. The last decade has seen the arrival of affective neuroscience: the study of the neural mechanisms behind emotion, including pleasure and desire. 1 Most questions remain unanswered, and experts disagree on many specifics, 2 but there are some things we can state with confidence. We begin with the reward system in the brain.

The Neuroscience of Pleasure - LessWrong

One of the most important affective neuronal systems relates to feelings of desire, or the appetite for rewards. Researchers refer to these appetitive processes using terms such as “wanting” (Berridge & Kringelbach, 2008), “seeking” (Panksepp & Biven, 2012), or “behavioural activation sensitivity” (Gray, 1987).

Affective neuroscience of pleasure: reward in humans and ...

Previous animal studies with primary rewards have shown the existence of so-called “hedonic hotspots” in the brain that are responsible for the generation of pleasure (61). These hedonic hotspots, found along the reward circuitry in the NAcc, insula, orbitofrontal cortex, and ventral pallidum, are modulated by opioid transmission (62).

Dopamine modulates the reward experiences elicited by ...

These results could result from an increased relevance of social rewards or a general decline in affective responding due to a potential association between social anhedonia and depression. Our findings provide preliminary evidence for neural aberrations of the reward system in social anhedonia, which is contingent upon reward type and reward dynamics.

Neural dynamics of monetary and social reward processing ...

In affective disorders, anhedonia (lack of pleasure) or dysphoria (negative affect) can result from breakdowns of that hedonic system. Human neuroimaging studies indicate that surprisingly similar circuitry is activated by quite diverse pleasures, suggesting a common neural currency shared by all.
