African Stone Sculpture Allison Philip

This review concerns the Lund Humphries (London) 1st edition of 1968. In African art there is a long and rich history of wood sculpture; because of this, Alison argues, stone African sculpture has been largely ignored. Since wood is perishable in tropical conditions, much of the history of African sculpture has therefore been lost.

Ankwanshi stone sculpture represents the physical permanence of African ancestral veneration. Ancestors in Stone showcases a recently acquired sixteenth-century akwanshi stone monolith from the Cross River region of Nigeria, along with figures and objects collectively made with stones. The exhibition, on view through the summer of 2020, speaks to the significance of stone both as a natural element and as a significant material in the veneration of West African forebears.
