when the engine is built or rebuilt the timing marks are used to set the timing for first start. once the engine is running, because of the number of teeth on the various gears the marks may only realign again after 20 or 30 or 50 or any other number of revolutions. if the vehicle runs well the timing is correct, if it were not you would be aware of it. slow to start is more likely to be a glow plug or compression problem assuming you do not have a fuel drain back or air leak issue.
