The typology approach captures the middle ground between the two previously described approaches. On the one hand, it seeks generalisable systemic regularities that permit the grouping of certain societies (or, more generally, social systems) and contrasts them with others, the underlying assumption being that the variation within a set of societies closely associated with a certain ideal type is smaller than between societies associated with different ideal types.

The logic of psychological classifications development demanded a parallel existence of two scientific approaches: one of which was named "psychology of types", and the other—"psychology of traits". In the course of time both approaches shifted towards each other: the psychology of types—in attempts to understand the structure of psychological traits of every type, trait psychology—in attempts to achieve a higher system of generalizations.
