By Rem Koolhaas and Hans Ulrich Obrist. Having wandered the ruins of Hiroshima,

Tokyo and other Japanese cities after WW II, The Metabolists – four architects, a critic, an industrial designer and a graphic designer – showed with the launch of their manifesto Metabolism 1960 how they would employ biological systems (aided by Japan's massive advances in technology) as inspiration for buildings and cities that could change and adapt to the vicissitudes of modern life.

Hajime Yatsuka's Japanese-language book Metaborisumu nekusasu (Metabolism nexus), like Project Japan, argues that the roots of Metabolism's audacious plans can be found in Japan's imperial era. This might come as a surprise in light of the premise's originality, but in fact the two books arose out of just the kind of casual connections that Koolhaas celebrates throughout his text: Koolhaas and Yatsuka have debated the topic of Metabolism over nearly two decades, and it is Yatsuka who ...
